

Memflation is a term coined by analysts at Gartner to describe the rapid rise in prices of semiconductor memory and data-storage components associated with the expanding demand for artificial intelligence infrastructure.

The phenomenon reflects a structural shift in the semiconductor market, leading to shortages and rising costs of memory-related components, with significant implications for the global technology and electronics industries.

APSC Relevance: Semiconductor industry, artificial intelligence and emerging technology trends.